tive failure. "The intervention was developed and implemented in an undergraduate electrical engineering class," he says. "The evaluation of the intervention has shown to improve problem-solving abilities of students."

At St Xavier's College, Mumbai, web classrooms are a new feature that encourages students to take one course on Moodle, an open source learning platform that encourages blended learning. To meet industry demands, colleges are also offering cutting-edge courses. Sharad Mhaiskar, dean of Mukesh Patel School of Technology Management & Engineering, Mumbai, says, "We have introduced a 'bachelors in technology' course in mechatronics. This branch is the need of the hour. We collaborated with experts from companies like Larsen and Toubro and Bosch, and set up four labs with Bosch and trained our faculty in India and Germany."

The four laboratories in hydraulics, pneumatics, mechatronics and PLC sensorics will have components, set-ups and configurations that are used in the industry. Along with these laboratories, a robotics laboratory having a 360-degree robot will be set up. For mechanical, computer, IT and electronics students at the college, these laboratories will serve as a state-of-the-art facility for technological integration and learning. Students will not only conduct experiments on these setups, but also undertake live industry projects.

The college also offers an MBA in agro-tech management. "This course was introduced to give a boost to agriculture in terms of technology. We need to upgrade the current practices in agriculture—for instance, instituting a proper supply chain after production," says Mhaiskar.

The college has also introduced a six-year BTech course for students who want to study engineering right after completing class 10. "After completing tenth standard, students go through the stress of getting into a junior college, and then again, the stress of going to a good engineering college. This course will ensure that they do not have to go through that," says Mhaiskar.

IIT Bombay has introduced dual degree programmes and courses such as MTech in civil engineering
